

Appendix 10*. Michael Petrilli's Expertise

pp. 1–4 According to USA Today and EWA

pp. 5–14 Michael Petrilli's Journalist Compliments on Twitter, July 2020 to November 2021

Out of a several dozen names of experts and alleged experts over the past decade, Michael Petrilli's is most frequently mentioned in the publication USA Today and at the website of the Education Writers Association. What are Petrilli's areas of expertise? What is his training and work experience? He has no specific relevant training, and no frontline experience in education. He worked for Checker Finn for many years at the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, then Institute, and then moved directly into a high-level position in the George W. Bush administration.

He does have expertise derived from continuous communication with Fordham's extensive network, funded by many millions of dollars from wealthy foundations. He's in touch with "what's happening now" among a certain elite, which is akin to the expertise of a gossip columnist.

Petrilli has no training or experience whatsoever in school finance, testing and measurement, collective bargaining, curriculum and instruction, behavior management medications, demographic trend analysis, civil rights law, career-technical education, child development, family structure analysis, political philosophy, federalism, ability grouping, homework, sequestration, budget analysis, social policy, or community development. Yet, the Permanent Education Press appoints him expert on all these topics. They like him personally. It is easy to reach him quickly. And, even if EWA's readers do not like EWA's super-intimate relationship with the Thomas B. Fordham Institute, they cannot do anything about it. EWA is supported by bazillions of dollars directly from wealthy foundations and other organizations "paying to play." EWA controls who gets attention. And, for some, attention is everything.

Michael Petrilli's Real Expertise?

Petrilli's Journalist Compliments on Twitter, July 2020 to November 2021

This appendix accompanies the book, The Malfunction of U.S. Education Policy: Elite Misinformation, Disinformation, and Selfishness.

The over 100 comments below come from just one fifteen-month period (July 16, 2020, to November 5, 2021) on a single communication platform, Twitter. Extrapolate from these fifteen months to two decades, and the saturation count exceeds a thousand, for Twitter alone.

One assumes that Michael Petrilli communicates with journalists via other channels, too, such as telephone, in meetings, face-to-face, and other social media platforms. For those who wonder how Petrilli, who lacks relevant scholarly training or work experience, has become education journalists' most popular source on education research and policy, here's a hint: being a constant, unrelenting, and ingratiating presence in journalists' lives is his job. He endeavors to keep them focused—looking where he wants them to look.

These below are just some of the complimentary tweets from this 15-month period. (I found the information suppression implicit to many of these tweets depressing and quit about halfway through.) Moreover, there were many other tweets that simply made others aware of a journalist's work, which itself might be considered a compliment by a journalist, or made suggestions for stories to journalists, suggestions that included consulting people and resources in his cartel.

Here are some lower-bound numbers of Twitter interactions (those exceeding 25) Petrilli had with journalists just in the July 2020 to November 2021 period:

Journalist	Media outlet	Number of Twitter interactions
Erica L. Green	New York Times	183

Rarely, Petrilli suggests research from outside his citation cartel, for example, research from the world of psychology. But, even then, he restricts his suggestions to the few psychologists above the "celebrity threshold."

Michael Petrilli is hardly the only citation cartel member constantly selling to the media, but he may be the most prolific. His is behavior made possible by millions of dollars a year from wealthy foundations.
